

THE BIG BONE THEORY!

By reporter Kyle Johnston

Yesterday at 4:30pm in a local village, what's thought to be a pre-historic bone was dug up in a resident's backyard.

Mr Jinx was washing the dishes, when he noticed his family dog sniffing and prancing more than usual at a particular spot in the garden.

The family had just moved to the area a number of weeks ago, and thought pebbles the dog was just marking his territory as all dogs tend to do. But as the time went on pebbles kept digging and digging until there was a massive hole in their garden.

It had gotten to the point where Mr Jinx had to start filling in the hole everytime pebbles dug there. But it was no use, because pebbles had just dug it back up again.

Then one evening when Mr Jinx got home from work he couldn't believe his eyes at the amount of clay that greeted him. On approaching the hole, Mr Jinx let an almighty gasp whilst pebbles stood wagging his tail all proud of himself. What he saw when he looked below, shocked him to his core. There was an enormous bone buried approximately 2 metres deep. When interviewing Mr Jinx, he said he knew right away that it wasn't a bone belonging to any ordinary animal. Local digger driver Geordy Kinney came as this was no job for a man with a shovel. When asked what his first impressions were, he replied. "Now that's something you don't see every day."

The residents of the

neighbourhood gathered
as the bone was being lifted out of where it had been buried for probably centuries.
Local authorities have sent the bone to specialist
laboratories for testing and hopefully answers to what type of bone this is and what animal it belonged to.
